This invention relates to a heating unit for use in a vehicle to heat a passenger compartment and more particularly, to the heating unit including two compressors and two fuel-fired burners operable to heat and circulate air within a passenger compartment. In vehicles provided with climate control systems, there is typically provided in the passenger compartment a heating means for heating the air and a cooling means for cooling the air. The air is warmed or cooled in response to actuation of a button or other user control means. In the case of the heating means, the heated air is circulated around the passenger compartment by a blower, sometimes called an evaporator fan, so that the temperature of the passenger compartment is maintained within a desired range. In addition to heating means for heating the air, the vehicle heating means typically include an air blower for circulating the air through the passenger compartment. In order to effectively heat the air, it has been conventional to include a large compressor to generate the necessary air flow. This has typically required the inclusion of a large and bulky engine. The use of large volume compressors has also made the product appear bulky, large and cumbersome. It is desirable to provide a compact and light weight vehicle heating system. A compact and light weight system is easier to install, operate and maintain. In accordance with the present invention, the heating unit includes two compressors, two fuel-fired burners and two air blowers. The two compressors and two burners are mounted on a common base plate. The two blowers are mounted for independent rotation on the base plate. The heating unit of the present invention offers several advantages over conventional heating units. The present invention allows the inclusion of two compressors and two burners into the heating unit. The compressors and burners are relatively small and compact. In addition, the heating unit of the present invention can be mounted in a desired position on the vehicle without disturbing the control mechanism or other vehicle components. These and other features and advantages of the present invention will be more fully set forth below.
